We have said that the ventilating tube may be the ordinary down spout, or rain water pipe; it may, but it ought not, for in no way would we permit such a valuable source of the finest water obtainable for washing and ablutionary purposes to be wasted. Every drop of rain water ought to be collected from the roof and passed into cisterns, of which more presently. Smoky Chimneys.--As for a smoky chimney, in the ordinary and certainly most disagreeable form met with, in nine cases out of ten it is caused, first, by defective workmanship, such as the want of careful pointing of the joints in the interior--bricks left out here and there, so as to allow of connection either with other flues or with the outer air. Again, the neglect of pargetting, or lining, with the usual mixture, well known to all...
